Assault is Dwindling, Except Around Vaux.

(By Times Special Wire.)

Paris, March 11.—The Battle of Verdun is fast dwindling in intensity. The Germans have in no way impaired the main defences of the fortress, notwithstanding the violence of their onslaughts. Whether they will make another big effort after a lull, or whether Whether they will make another big effort after a lull, or whether the battle will end, as did the other great offensives on the western front, by return to normal conditions of trench warfare, cannot be discerned at present, but French military opinion is inclined to be-lieve the latter will be the case. On the west bank of the Meuse the Germans, facing an effective

They contented themselves with winning back. at heavy cost, portions of Gorbeaux wood, which were wrested from them on the preceding day. The determined nature of the attack there indicates the Germans evidently intend, if possible, to drive them on the preceding day. The determined nature of the attack there indicates the Germans evidently intend, if possible, to drive through Oumieres wood to the village of Oumieres, and get in hetween Dead Man and Goose Hills. This they nearly succeeded in doing on Wodnesday. Once solidly established there, they would be able to repeat this process against Dead Man Hill.

Fighting to the east of the Meane at present is hardly as active as that to the west of the river. The ranks of the Germans were depleted by yesterday's heavy losses in the attacks between Donanmont village and Haudroment and on the village of Vaux, which were cut short by French fire before being developed.
